James Watt.

JAMES WATT, the renowned engineer and mechanic, is painted at the age of about fifteen years, sitting in a large arm chair decorated with tapestry, his head on his left arm, and before him a common kettle on a fire in a large marble fire-place; the mantle-piece surmounted by China vases and a painting. The young man has in his right hand a pair of tongs, and puts the extreme end of one of the branches to the neck of the kettle where the steam is escaping. He seems to be absorbed by his thoughts, and does not hear his aunt, Miss Murhead, standing just behind him, who is blaming him for losing again his valuable time in unsuccessful experiments on the application of steam.

The good woman had no idea of the future advantages of the invention of her nephew to commerce and industry.

The figure of James Watt is in double light, by the light of the lamp and the reddish glimmer of the fire-place.
